

Q1.3 → Claire

Claire, in the keynote this morning, you mentioned that 240 million creators went LIVE globally in 2025 — nearly double year-on-year. Is that growth a sign that LIVE has already 'made it,' or is this still the beginning?

- I think the answer is both. With more than 240 million creators going LIVE globally in 2025, LIVE is operating on a significant scale and is increasingly recognised as a mainstream entertainment format.
- But in many ways, the most important chapter is only beginning. Scale tells us that creators and audiences see value in LIVE, but scale alone is not the goal.
- What matters now is helping creators deepen their skills, build stronger communities and turn their passion into a sustainable path.
- The next phase is about raising the quality of the LIVE experience and creating even more meaningful connections between creators and audiences.

That brings us to something you've been working on closely. When TikTok LIVE talks about the 'professionalization of LIVE,' what does that actually look like on the ground?

- For creators, it means having more support to develop their talent into something sustainable—whether that means stronger audience interaction, better production or a clearer content identity.
- For audiences, it means LIVE experiences that remain spontaneous and authentic, but offer greater quality, depth and consistency.
- Creator Networks make this support practical and local. Take ways.of.john in the Philippines as an example. He started with no livestreaming experience, but with ongoing training and production support from his network Magik Studios, he developed into a professional LIVE creator and built an audience of more than 850,000 followers, reaching viewers well beyond the Philippines.
- We see the wider impact of that structured support in the data. According to our whitepaper, creators supported by Creator Networks are nearly ten times more likely to build a meaningful livelihood through LIVE.
- That is what professionalization means to us: giving creators stronger foundations so that what makes them distinctive can come through more clearly

Claire, TikTok LIVE now works with more than 21,000 Creator Networks across very different markets. How does TikTok LIVE help networks strengthen their capabilities while still allowing different local models to develop?

- We share tools, standards and learnings across regions.
- That is also why we are bringing Creator Network leaders together at this Global Summit: to exchange practical experience, learn from different operating models and take useful ideas back to their own markets.
- We also provide LIVE Backstage, an integrated platform that helps network teams manage their operations and spend more time supporting creators.
- But we are not trying to export one operating model everywhere. Our role is to provide a strong common foundation while giving networks the flexibility to apply their local knowledge and build the model that works best for their creators and market

Claire, trust is a word we hear a lot in conversations about creator ecosystems. What does it actually mean in practice as TikTok LIVE grows — and why are clear standards and safety a foundation for growth, rather than a constraint on it?

- Trust is what makes growth durable. It gives audiences confidence in the LIVE experience, and it helps protect creators and Creator Networks that operate responsibly.
- Clear governance and operating standards give networks a common foundation across markets—reducing uncertainty, raising professionalism, and making it easier to grow sustainably, while still leaving room for local expertise and creativity.
- Responsible growth means building safety, compliance, content quality, and platform integrity into how the ecosystem operates from the start.

Q3.4 → Claire

Staying on that idea of sustainable growth — once you have the right standards in place, you also need the right tools to operate at scale.

Claire, TikTok LIVE introduced LIVE Bax as an AI assistant at the summit. How is it helping Creator Networks in their day-to-day work?

- LIVE Bax is designed to help Creator Networks find information and complete routine tasks more efficiently in LIVE Backstage.
- By reducing time spent on routine work, it gives managers more time to focus on working with creators to explore diverse content and interaction formats, and enhance audience engagement.
- LIVE Bax is designed to support — not replace — Network teams, helping them make better-informed decisions while keeping their relationships, judgment, and local expertise at the heart of creator support

Lightning Round for all speakers

Final thought from each of you: what's the one thing you're most excited to see happen for creators in the next few years?

- I'm excited to see more creators build sustainable, long-term paths through LIVE — supported by better tools, stronger networks, and clear community standards. The next phase should be defined not only by greater scale, but by higher-quality content and deeper creator communities. When those two things come together, the whole ecosystem benefits.
